LETTER FROM THE CEO

Did you know that the longest-running film festival in North America is actually based in Canada? It's true—the Yorkton Film Festival, which takes place each May in Yorkton, Saskatchewan, was founded in 1947, growing out of a National Film Board initiative to boost the morale of Canadians during WWII. It continues today, exhibiting Canadian and international productions, and stands as a proud example of Canada's deep film-festival history.

Our cover story, "Festival Fever" (page 6), takes an in-depth look at film festivals across the country. It's a fascinating study in genre and geography that underscores the important role festivals play for filmmakers and fans alike. After reading the piece, I found a new appreciation for the truly special events that they are.

The dozens of festivals occurring in Canada each year act as a significant launch pad for diverse independent producers, and also offer audiences a unique opportunity to watch movies to which they might otherwise not be exposed. From Yorkton in 1947 to today, it's certainly evident that our country's film festivals are great builders of community.

Now, when one thinks of Canada's film community, there is arguably no organization that has done more to help Canadian filmmakers and promote domestic feature films than Telefilm Canada. My congratulations go out to this pivotal organization as it celebrates its 50th anniversary. On page 11, we hear from Telefilm's outgoing chair, Michel Roy, as he reflects on this important milestone.

One of the things I like most about film festivals is the opportunity they present for fans and the industry to interact. There is nothing quite like the rush at the red carpet on a festival's opening night. Our photo spread (page 30) captures some of these key moments from recent festivals across Canada, and also digs into the archives for some fun shots from decades past.

The focus on genre is another great feature of Canada's film-festival scene. From Fantasia in Montreal to Hot Docs in Toronto to the Ottawa International Animation Festival, genre festivals represent some of the best events on offer. When it comes to genre films, Canada has long punched above its weight. In this issue, we speak with documentary producer Ina Fichman about her upcoming projects and her thoughts on why Canadian filmmakers make such good documentarians. We also hear from Breakthrough Entertainment's Nat Abraham about why producing horror films is a bloody good business model.

For producers of feature films, the screening of a project at a festival is often anticipated as either the end of the beginning or the beginning of the end. The festival circuit can be the crowning achievement after months or years of hard work on a film, or it can be the gateway to massive audiences and global distribution.

Interestingly, Canada's production sector is at a similar crossroads. The way in which films are made and viewed is indeed changing. Our article on homegrown tech start-up Wattpad ("Wattpad Studios Lights Up the Black Box," page 18) looks at how the Canadian company's innovative approach to data-driven content development is pushing the global production sector in new and exciting directions. New digital technologies are also changing the way films are distributed. On page 34, we speak with eOne's Mark Slone about his new role as President of the Canadian Association of Film Distributors and Exporters and his view on the future of content distribution in a digital world.

Like any good film festival, this issue of Indiescreen is jammed full of great content. And, of course, that includes our definitive production list. In this edition, we've focused on feature film productions in Canada (pages 36–98). Leafing through the hundreds of productions listed, the impressive scale of our industry truly becomes evident, along with the key economic and cultural roles that the media production sector plays right across the country.

As you read through this extensive list of productions, be sure to jot down the titles that catch your eye—chances are some will soon be screening at a film festival near you.

FESTIVAL FEVER

From Whitehorse to St. John's, film festivals play a key role in stimulating Canada's movie industry—and keeping our stories alive

Canada, it would seem, is teeming with film festivals. No matter where you are in the country, throw a stone and you just might hit an eager moviegoer standing in line. From the biggest (undoubtedly, Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF), with nearly half a million attendees) to the biggest-hearted (insert name of your favourite local fest here), film festivals are everywhere. Film festivals here have always been a community affair. Canada's first—and North America's longest-running—festival was launched in 1947, but put any images of red-carpet glitz out of your mind. The location was Yorkton, Saskatchewan, a small town 300 kilometres southeast of Saskatoon; the festival grew out of a National Film Board program, which screened films in towns across Canada to bolster citizen morale during WWII. In 1950, Yorkton's population hovered around 8,000, but even in the festival's early days, it was drawing crowds of 4,000 with its programming.

These humble yet triumphant beginnings feel perfectly suited to what has come after. Today, Canadian film festivals are some of the most recognizable and important in the world. The recognition may start with TIFF, but it certainly doesn't end there. From north to south, west to east, festivals like Available Light Film Festival (Whitehorse), Vancouver International Film Festival (VIFF), Calgary International Film Festival, Hot Docs Canadian International Documentary Festival (Toronto), imagineNATIVE Film + Media Arts Festival (Toronto), Inside Out LGBT Film Festival (Toronto and Ottawa), Ottawa International Animation Festival, Fantasia Film Festival (Montreal), FIN: Atlantic International Film Festival (Halifax) and St. John's International Women's Film Festival ensure that films of all lengths and genres are represented, and communities of all shapes and sizes are served. And this list doesn't begin to scratch the surface of the hundreds of well-loved, well-attended festivals to be found in practically every city, town and village across the country.

But what exactly do Canada's film festivals do? What role do they play in Canada's feature film sector?

HELPING FILMS—AND FILMMAKERS—TAKE OFF

All films essentially have one goal: to get seen.

"The ability of film festivals to reach Canadian audiences is enormous," says Carolle Brabant, Executive Director of Telefilm Canada, a federal agency that helps to finance, develop and promote Canadian feature films. "They are in every province and territory from coast to coast to coast."

According to Cameron Bailey, Artistic Director at TIFF, "From what Canadian filmmakers tell us, selection at the festival can do a lot to get a homegrown film seen, both here in Canada and abroad."

Indeed, since most Canadian films tend to be released theatrically in only a handful of the country's largest cities, film festivals provide a critical window in which to build awareness and audience. "Festivals should be seen as part of an integrated marketing plan, as well as a way for filmmakers to connect directly with an audience and establish a reputation," Brabant says.

Of course, winning an award at a festival can go a long way toward establishing that reputation (to say nothing of the monetary benefit). Brabant mentions, as recent examples, the documentaries Haida Gwaii: On the Edge of the World and KONELINE: Our Land Beautiful. "They both premiered at Hot Docs, won audience awards there, and went on to be invited to festivals around the world." Similarly, micro-budget documentary All the Time in the World, set in the Yukon, premiered at VIFF in 2014 and has taken home 22 prizes at last count.

Given the breadth and variety of festivals in Canada, winning an award at a domestic festival is certainly worth striving for—and, frankly, achievable, at least compared to the more pie-in-the-sky goal of capturing the Palme d'Or at the Cannes Film Festival in France.

Paul Gratton is Director of Programming at BC's Whistler Film Festival, which is held the first weekend of December, in conjunction with an industry summit. Since the festival falls late in the year—months after the frenzy of TIFF—and screens less than 100 films, Gratton believes it affords filmmakers a greater chance of winning accolades, including the $15,000 Borsos Award for Best Canadian Feature, and less chance of "getting lost in the shuffle." The festival's stunning mountain-village backdrop is just icing on the cake.

Wherever they're handed out, festival awards and accolades add up to more than good buzz. In 2011, Telefilm ended its practice of measuring and rewarding films' success based on box-office results alone. Today, Telefilm's Success Index gives 30 per cent weighting to a film's performance at festivals, with 10 per cent devoted to performance at national film festivals. This means that a producer doesn't necessarily have to reap box-office gold with one project to secure Telefilm financing for their next.

Brabant explains the shift: "Success or failure at the domestic box office can be the result of so many unforeseeable or uncontrollable things, like a release date that coincides with another big release, or even bad weather. Independent films needed a more complete measure of success that captured these other forms of success we were observing."

DELIVERING QUALITY CANADIAN CONTENT TO AUDIENCES

Charlotte Mickie, former President of film distributor Mongrel International, notes that a film's distribution future goes hand in hand with an audience's reaction to it. (Her festival successes include selling Deepa Mehta's Water on TIFF's opening night in 2005.)

"TIFF has always been a public festival, and distributors have always been interested in the reaction of the Toronto audiences," Mickie says. "Distributors love the audience response, because it's a way to gauge how the American audiences will respond to films. At the same time, they always say, 'Oh, they overreact in Toronto a little bit.'"

Long may they overreact. Bailey considers himself lucky to have witnessed audiences' strong reactions to "films as varied as Clement Virgo's Rude, Sarah Polley's Stories We Tell and Philippe Falardeau's Monsieur Lazhar." Brabant mentions Maudie, Weirdos and Closet Monster as recent examples of films that got a lot of love at TIFF. All of these films have gone on to garner their share of critical acclaim and commercial success.

Of course, audiences don't always get it right. In 1988, TIFF opened with David Cronenberg's Dead Ringers. According to Bailey, "A few people fled the theatre. Many were shocked. In retrospect, that film is acknowledged all over the world as masterpiece, but it didn't have what you could call great buzz."

Canada has no equivalent to Cannes, France's prestigious, invitation-only industry festival. Our festivals are just as much, if not more, for audiences as they are for industry insiders. And the thrill of attending a festival goes beyond the possibility of glimpsing Ryan Reynolds at a premiere. Though, for big fests like TIFF, one mustn't discount the high-octane sport of celebrity spotting.

According to Brabant, "Film festivals are, and have always been, one of the primary venues for the Canadian public to discover and engage with Canadian cinema, which is so rich and diverse."

After all, audiences are getting a chance to see—or even just hear about—the films that, as mentioned, would otherwise have limited theatrical release in cities far from many people's homes. The films may show up on pay TV or a streaming service down the road, but without a festival to call attention to them in the first place, they could be easy to ignore. At a festival, a film is given a chance to take root. The director may be there to answer questions; cast members could be in attendance. In Mickie's words, "Festivals keep people interested in the magic of cinema."

Film festivals help out with the box-office thing, too—the industry aspect of any festival is key. Filmmakers are often there to secure a future for their films. This means hobnobbing with distributors and sales agents, whether informally or as part of a formal initiative like TIFF's International Financing Forum, which brokers meetings between producers and international agents, or FIN's Strategic Partners, a networking forum for producers who are looking for financing or a partner to co-produce with.

Says Brabant, "Big, internationally recognized festivals—like TIFF, Hot Docs, Fantasia, VIFF—can generate awareness from international buyers, sellers, producers, programmers, key creatives and agents from practically every corner of the world. This is just invaluable."

And is anyone complaining if all this wheeling and dealing is done in some of the most spectacular and welcoming places in the country?

"We talk a lot about Whistler being the hot-tub film festival," laughs Gratton. "You're going to rub shoulders with distributors and producers in a nice, informal, friendly ski-resort kind of atmosphere."

Asked to describe what filmmakers can expect at PEI's Charlottetown Film Festival, Executive Director Cheryl Wagner responds: "Connections. Encouragement. Oysters." That's an offer that's hard to turn down.

"From what Canadian filmmakers tell us, selection at the festival can do a lot to get a homegrown film seen, both here in Canada and abroad."
— Cameron Bailey

Anita Adams, Executive Director of First Weekend Club—a Vancouver-based organization that promotes Canadian films and builds audiences for their first weekend in theatres—uses festivals to scout films she wants to promote. "There's just excitement that happens around the festivals," she says, singling out VIFF ("It really is a great audience festival") and the Whistler Film Festival ("They do a bang-up job of the programming").

The Whistler Film Festival illustrates the important role festivals play in bringing specifically Canadian content to audiences. Gratton explains that "even though we're an international film festival with foreign films, American indie films, a documentary slate, et cetera, we pride ourselves on the fact that over 50 per cent of our feature films every year are Canadian content. We showcase emerging talent, female directors, lower-budget second and third features that might not otherwise get the recognition they deserve."

And, since Whistler's screening venues are not huge, "You can sell out your venue with a couple hundred people, easily. So that creates a fun atmosphere."

There's an emphasis on local at every film festival in the country. Even at TIFF, where it's conceivable that Canadian movies might be drowned out by the sheer volume of screenings, Bailey declares that "Canadian film is at the heart of everything we do." In celebration of Canada 150, at this year's festival, a collection of 150 essential Canadian moving-image works—feature films, documentaries, television shows, music videos, even commercials—will be presented, alongside new restorations of Canadian films.

GIVING A PLATFORM TO DIVERSE VOICES

There's another angle to Canada's film festivals—they can be powerful community-building tools.

Take Inside Out, Canada's largest LGBTQ film festival. Inside Out holds annual festivals in both Toronto and Ottawa, showing films from over 25 countries and drawing 35,000 attendees. Throughout the year, Inside Out runs a number of programs, including the Queer Video Mentorship Project, which gives queer youth the opportunity to learn how to make a film. Established in 1991, Inside Out has witnessed much change and evolved accordingly.

"In 2017, we're keenly aware of the role that we need to play as advocates for LGBTQ people within our industry nationally and internationally," says Andria Wilson, Executive Director of Inside Out. "Developing a comprehensive industry program that specifically supports queer and trans people is one way that we can contribute to the sustainability of LGBTQ filmmaking in the future, which in turn creates sustainability for our festival and strengthens our ability to bring content to our community."

The festival seeks to give participating filmmakers "the best experience possible," according to Wilson. This includes promoting their screening, connecting them with local and international producers, and helping them network with distributors and agents and secure financing through the Inside Out Film Finance Forum.

"We are so excited by the opportunities that we have to showcase and to amplify queer and trans voices," says Wilson. "And we're very interested in the role we can play as Canadians to create a space for industry and artist development."

JAY BARUCHEL AND PATTON OSWALT,
WHISTLER FILM FESTIVAL, 2011

CAROLLE BRABANT, TELEFILM CANADA

Of course, Inside Out isn't the only festival that fosters this kind of support for diverse filmmakers. Toronto's imagineNATIVE, which promotes Indigenous screen content through its yearly festival and year-round initiatives, does more than give Indigenous filmmakers a stage on which to showcase their work. Through the festival's Industry Series—panels, workshops, labs and masterclasses—it also equips them to succeed at their craft and in the business.

"There's a feeling when you're at this festival that is different than any other," says Daniel Northway-Frank, imagineNATIVE's Industry Director. "There is a visceral and emotional connection to the works and artists we support."

Virtually all film festivals include a professional-development component—from workshops to mentorship opportunities—geared toward helping filmmakers succeed at what they do, and providing "industry insights and market intelligence that producers wouldn't otherwise be exposed to," explains Telefilm's Brabant.

More and more of these initiatives are being geared toward filmmakers who, historically, have been marginalized, or who continue to face barriers to entry. This July, TIFF launched Share Her Journey, a program designed to address the alarming lack of gender parity in the film industry (for example, out of the top 250 films of 2016, only 7 per cent were directed by women). The initiative will include an accelerator program for female producers and a three-month residency program for emerging female creators. Developments like this underscore the growing mood of audiences and industry insiders alike: we want to hear from everyone.

"Our big dream is to help create and strengthen a sense of friendly community for filmmakers across Atlantic Canada."
— Cheryl Wagner

Of course, regional film festivals, regardless of their size, also do important work in recognizing and developing local talent. The Charlottetown Film Festival, for example, celebrates the work of independent filmmakers from the Atlantic provinces, particularly PEI.

"Our big dream," says Cheryl Wagner, "is to help create and strengthen a sense of friendly community for filmmakers across Atlantic Canada." Last year's festival attracted hundreds of film fans, showing dozens of films at 12 different screening locations across the provincial capital.

Big and not-so-big festivals all over the country share the same goal: the success of Canada's film industry and all of the varied voices within it. This work extends into the future, through shifting concerns, changing technologies and an ever-increasing supply of content from all over the world.

"Now that we have thousands of films at the touch of a screen, why do we still need film festivals?" Bailey asks. "The answer is curation. Festivals help tell us what to pay attention to, where the conversation is right now around the aesthetics, the politics and the business of movies. Each film festival in Canada serves a particular community and a particular group of filmmakers. We need that, or we'd drown."

CHERYL WAGNER, CHARLOTTETOWN FILM FESTIVAL

TELEFILM CANADA TURNS 50!

Telefilm Canada is the country's primary means of support for the audiovisual industry, fostering the development of quality Canadian content through its financing, promotion and research activities. In honour of Telefilm's 50th anniversary, we invited outgoing chairman Michel Roy to share what lies ahead for the organization.

Grateful for its rich history, and with its sights set firmly on the future, Telefilm Canada is marking its 50th anniversary this year by celebrating our great country's creative talent. Since its emergence in the 1960s, the country's audiovisual industry has been propelled by Canadian talent, so that today, its international reputation is undeniable.

From cinema to television to digital media, Canadian content has evolved over the years, and the industry has successfully overcome many challenges. Today, our content offering, as attractive and diverse as ever, can be accessed on an increasing array of platforms. As such, we must now intensify our collective efforts to better promote Canadian content, while also placing a greater emphasis on exporting Canada's cultural products.

Today more than ever, we at Telefilm are encouraging creativity, audacity and innovation at all stages of the production chain. We are providing strong support to films made by women, Indigenous talent, emerging filmmakers and culturally diverse communities, as we are convinced that these productions will enrich our cultural heritage and help us connect with new audiences in Canada and abroad.

During my two terms as the head of Telefilm Canada, I have crossed paths with many inspiring creative talents, dynamic entrepreneurs, committed partners and devoted colleagues. And I have had the pleasure of watching the industry's various partners work together to propel Canadian talent to new heights.

For all these reasons, I look forward to the future with a great deal of confidence.

Q&A

STUDIO'S

BETH STEVENSON

SOMETHING ABOUT BARRIE

As a former Partner at Decode Entertainment and an Executive Vice-President at DHX Media, Beth Stevenson knows all about corporate success. But in 2011, Stevenson decided to change the channel—and founded Brain Power, a full-service production studio based in Barrie, Ontario, a small city an hour's drive north of Toronto. Now, with 19 television series and films completed under the Brain Power banner, Beth has written a new success story: one where a family-run business, operating in a small community, produces great content while providing stable employment and an excellent place to work. We spoke with Stevenson about what makes her company tick.

What inspired you to start a production company from scratch? And (with all due respect) why Barrie?

I enjoyed corporate life, but was missing the entrepreneurial side of my brain. I like to get up every day and make things, build things. Most of all, I wanted to build a nice environment to be able to work in myself. So, when we started making our first show, Fuzzy Tales—a CBC preschool program for which we green-screened hundreds of live animals in my kitchen—we found a cameraperson and DOP and editor named Justin G. Dyck, who lived in Barrie. We started to work with him there, and we really loved filming in Barrie, and we now have a 7,000-square-foot studio there. And Justin has directed 14 of our projects to date.

Tell us more about your staff. How many people work for you, and how do you find them?

Well, instead of hiring on a project-by-project basis, I asked: What would happen if we gave people secure full-time jobs and carried them between filming days? And what's happened is that we get to work with a very focused group of people who aren't constantly looking for their next job. We're supporting about 40 people's livelihoods, and reach out to an additional 20 to 30 local people for very specific roles on specific projects.

On the animation side, we support hundreds. In fact, when we started to produce Luna Petunia for Netflix, we placed the animation in Sudbury—we put $3 million into Sudbury without even going to the Northern Ontario Heritage Fund.

As for finding talent, I'm a bit notorious for trolling Kijiji. I never say, "I'm looking for someone with film and television experience"—I look for transferable skill sets, and that has let us discover some incredible talent. For example, our first office manager did children's face painting on the side, so we sent her to Seneca to do film and TV makeup courses, and now she's a full-time makeup artist with us. When Brain Power started to do more live action, I asked my contractor husband, "You ever build a green screen before?" So he works with us too. Honestly, a lot of times, I don't look at us as being in the film and television business—I look at us as a family-run business in a small community.

“Instead of hiring on a project-by-project basis, I asked: What would happen if we gave people secure full-time jobs and carried them between filming days?”

What would you say to someone hoping to escape the big city and replicate your model?

Everyone is absolutely encouraged to replicate this model, but you need a certain savviness. I believe I can do this because I've taken all of my filing cabinets of experience with me, on both the creative and the financing side. I worked for people like Robert Lantos, and with amazing business partners like Neil Court and Steven DeNure, and I was able to jam all that into my brain. Also, at Brain Power, we are willing to put everything in our lives on the screen to make higher-quality projects—and, literally, there are days when my master bedroom is the green room.

NORTHERN LIGHTS

The (recently renamed) CMPA Indiescreen Awards recognize Canadian independent feature film producers who are shining bright at home and on the world stage.

Nominees in the Emerging Producer category were chosen for the immense potential demonstrated during their relatively short careers. The nominees in the Established Producer category were selected for their full body of work, and represent the best of Canada's contribution to global cinema.

To be eligible for the Indiescreen Awards, nominees are required to have a feature film selected for screening at TIFF this year. The winners will be announced in Toronto on September 7, as part of the opening of the festival.

COMPANY: PRIMITIVE ENTERTAINMENT
FILM AT TIFF: THERE IS A HOUSE HERE

For 27 years, Michael McMahon, Kevin McMahon and Kristina McLaughlin have produced innovative and complex documentary content at Primitive Entertainment. Their work takes an inherently Canadian approach to nonfiction content in both method and subject matter. Their vast filmography has won more than 40 awards worldwide. They have a long history of creating films that engage with Indigenous issues, which is why they were particularly interested in the challenge and opportunity of There Is a House Here, which explores the complicated relationship Canada has with northern Indigenous communities.

WITH

STEVEN THIBAUT

MIGHTY MIGHTY MOVIE STUDIO

BRON Studios' Executive Vice President, Steven Thibault, joined the growing company in 2011, two years after its launch, when its only program was an animated kids' series called Mighty Mighty Monsters. Times have certainly changed—today BRON's Midas touch is evident across the entertainment sector. With wave-making films like The Birth of a Nation and Fences (with four Academy Award nominations and a win for Viola Davis) still fresh in audiences' minds, BRON isn't about to slow down. We spoke to Thibault to find out how Canadian sensibilities and a global strategy have created a new powerhouse.

Since you joined BRON, it seems the company has really evolved in some very interesting ways. What kind of work can we expect from BRON over the next year or two?

We are focused on important voices and important filmmakers, and have been lucky enough to work with some incredible people over the last few years, from Jason Reitman to Dan Gilroy to Denzel Washington to Sam Levinson to Debra Granik to Jennifer Kent. These are filmmakers who create culturally and socially relevant stories that are also commercially viable globally.

Our next project is called The Frontrunner, and it's the story of Gary Hart, who was a presidential candidate in the '80s. He has an affair and it kills his candidacy. The story is so relevant, because it's the first time that mass media became involved to the point of affecting an election. This was, in part, a precursor to some of the political issues we are facing today. It is an important story to tell.

We just started shooting The Red Sea Diving Resort in South Africa, with Gideon Raff from Homeland as our director/writer. It's sort of Argo meets Hotel Rwanda, about a joint CIA/Mossad operation to rescue Ethiopian refugees who were being killed by their own government. It's both entertaining and really intense; I was laughing and crying at the same time while I was reading the script.

We're also in development on animated TV projects. We have grown our internal television group, as well as partnered with [former HBO executive] Michael Ellenberg to launch a company called Media Res—we're teaming up with him to launch and expand BRON's TV arm.

Television? Is this your strategy for total world domination?

It is one of them, yes!

Seriously, though, given your focus on both television and feature film, and given the breadth of viewing options available to audiences today, how does BRON choose its projects?

We have a strong development team based in LA, which focuses on finding and developing unique, relevant and commercially viable stories for both film and television outlets.

Over the years, our ability to develop and access incredible works, and to strategically package our projects, has allowed BRON to continue to grow and achieve more success. This did not come overnight. It came with many years of effort and learning, with some wins and losses along the way.

“We're not particular, necessarily; we're really driven by the creativity and the commercial viability of the project. We have Canadian sensibilities, but with an eye on the global market.”

Also important is our sensibility: BRON does not think “Canadian only.” We've produced some great Canadian projects where we've partnered with Canadian producers—such as Into the Forest with Niv Fichman of Rhombus Media, for example—and we're developing some international co-productions with the UK and others. We're not particular, necessarily; we're really driven by the creativity and the commercial viability of the project. We have Canadian sensibilities, but with an eye on the global market.

Does it feel to you and your colleagues that BRON has really exploded?

Every movie that we've made has been strategically thought out. I wouldn't say that we've exploded so much as we've made some very good, deliberate choices.

No plans to move headquarters to LA?

Not a chance. While we continue our expansion south of the border, we are Canadian and will always remember our roots.

WATTPAD STUDIOS LIGHTS UP THE BLACK BOX

HOW THE TORONTO-BASED FICTION PLATFORM PLANS TO REVOLUTIONIZE THE DEVELOPMENT PROCESS AND UPEND MEDIA PRODUCTION AS WE KNOW IT

Aron Levitz, Head of Toronto-based Wattpad Studios, has a diagnosis for the media production industry. He's pretty confident he also has a cure.

First, the diagnosis. "All producers are trying to make someone's favourite—favourite TV show, favourite film, favourite game. But it turns out we're not really good at it," says Levitz. He lists the symptoms: Disney's 70 per cent share of box office last year. The 60–70 per cent of TV shows that don't make it to year two. The hundreds of busted pilots. The nearly 200 movie sequels and remakes currently in production. "If we could make new IP that we knew would be a hit, this wouldn't be a problem," he says.

ENTER WATTPAD.

If you've never heard of Wattpad, you're increasingly in the minority. Wattpad is an online storytelling community with over 55 million users around the world and more than 375 million story uploads (think YouTube, but for written fiction). It recently launched Wattpad Studios, which connects the site's most popular writers with film, TV, digital media and book deals.

Wattpad's writers have already begun to find remarkable fame outside of the platform.

ARON LEVITZ, WATTPAD STUDIOS

The most obvious case is After. It started as a piece of One Direction fan fiction by a Texas waitress named Anna Todd, racked up over 1.5 billion reads (yes, that's right—billion with a "b") on the site, and is now published in good old-fashioned print by Simon & Schuster. A movie with Paramount is in the works.

Isabelle Ronin, a nurse from Winnipeg, wrote the romance serial Chasing Red, which got 126 million reads last year; she now has a book deal in eight countries.

Wisconsin student Kara Barbieri's White Stag was read six and a half times more than any other fantasy story on Wattpad. She recently landed a three-book deal with Macmillan.

To handle the soaring popularity of its top writers, in 2015, Wattpad launched a talent-management program called Wattpad Stars. Through the program, writers can be discovered, receive marketing support, get their work published or adapted for screen, or be commissioned to write native advertising content for brands.

"One of the very unique things that Wattpad brings to the universe is that there isn't one way for a writer to become successful," claims Levitz.

Wattpad is an entirely new medium, and Wattpad Stars is designed to help writers flourish within it, by identifying opportunities for career growth and wider reach. The program currently represents approximately 200 writers, and that number is rapidly growing.

"And they were all found through data," claims Levitz. "That's the beauty: we can pick things out whether we like them or not. We can discover what's important to audiences, whether or not it's something we would gravitate towards ourselves. We've taken the personal bias out of the equation."

Understandably, given his access to so much of it, Levitz loves data. He knows what's being read, who's reading it and where, how many readers are engaging with it, and what they're saying about it. He knows what stories people want. He doesn't need to wait for the next Twilight-style blockbuster to learn that dark mermaids are the new vampires. He doesn't have to watch Netflix's Santa Clarita Diet to figure out that cannibalism is hot right now—he knew it was hot a year ago.

"We can find producers the biggest stories; we can find them the most interesting stories. You want Spanish werewolves in Germany? We can get very specific in the asks," says Levitz.

"One of the very unique things that Wattpad brings to the universe is that there isn't one way for a writer to become successful."

— Aron Levitz

WATTPAD HQ, TORONTO

WATTPAD TEAM

Levitz doesn't claim that a popular story on Wattpad will automatically translate to a successful film or series. There are simply too many factors involved in adaptation for that kind of ironclad guarantee—"but it sure has a better chance of success than a dusty script in a drawer, or a development exec with a 'good feeling about this one,'" says Levitz.

Abby Ho is Head of Wattpad Stars and a former producer at Epitome Pictures and the CBC. She puts it this way: "There's a good Tom Hanks movie and there's a bad Tom Hanks movie. The difference is the story, and a good story will always win. And having a community – an audience – that engages around a story is an incredibly powerful thing."

Wattpad offers more than a constantly refreshing library of stories on which to base a project. If a producer knows a space they want to fill—military love stories, for example—Wattpad can ask hundreds of its stars to write a synopsis of a story. "We choose 10 that we really love, pay each of them a small amount, and ask them to expand their paragraph to two pages. We choose three or four we really love, pay them a bit more, have them write the first three chapters in public and watch the audience react to all of them," explains Levitz. "The high-level trends you get from the audience can help you make really interesting development decisions in the early days, before you've spent a dollar on film."

Ho adds, "It's not a choose-your-own-adventure scenario. It's about making smarter decisions and allowing the audience to be involved in that process."

"Development right now is a really hidden process—a black box," stresses Levitz. "A producer finds something they like, grabs a writer, there are some network execs, arguments, notes. Finally, maybe you get a trailer out of it. Maybe a pilot. But the audience has no idea, and this is insane to me."

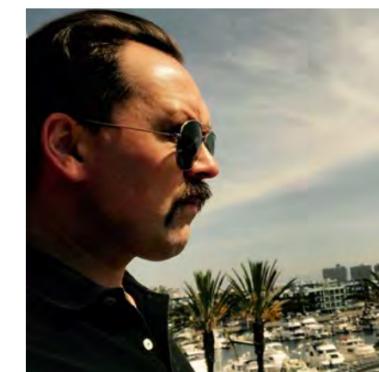

Producers from the United States, the Philippines and other countries are already jumping aboard the Wattpad bandwagon. In Canada, Vancouver's The Coup Company, whose CineCoup film accelerator brought us WolfCop, has teamed up with Wattpad for a short-film competition based on Wattpad Star Josh Saltzman's horror anthology Strange Yarns. Filmmakers were invited to submit one-minute pitch videos based on a single story; these will be vetted by the collaborators and evaluated by fans, with the top shorts being produced later this year.

"It's like they've got the peanut butter and I've got the chocolate—we can make something magical together."

— J. Joly

"They have great stories, and I can find great filmmakers," says J. Joly, The Coup Company's CEO. "It's like they've got the peanut butter and I've got the chocolate—we can make something magical together." He adds, "They're pioneers, and it's great to be working with a company like that. After all, content is king, but the audience is god."

Levitz agrees: "Both of us believe in the value that the crowd brings."

J. JOLY, THE COUP COMPANY

Striking up strategic collaborations with producers ultimately serves Wattpad's end goal: becoming a full-stack entertainment company. "We want to be able to finance our own content, of all lengths and shapes and sizes," says Levitz. While the Netflixes of the world might do well to keep one eye looking over their shoulder, Levitz is taking the company's grand ambitions—and his role in realizing them—in stride.

"It's a crazy opportunity that I've been given by Wattpad," he says, "and it's a hell of a lot of fun."

BREAKTHROUGH

NAT ABRAHAM

A BLOODY GOOD BUSINESS MODEL

Toronto-based Breakthrough Entertainment may have built its reputation on family-friendly fare, from The Adventures of Dudley the Dragon to L.M. Montgomery's Anne of Green Gables, but four years ago, the company's strategy took a slightly more macabre turn. Teaming up with Black Fawn Films and, more recently, 5'7 Films, Breakthrough has been steadily turning out horror flicks and thrillers to keep you on the edge of your seat—or, more likely, jumping out of it. Partner and President of Distribution Nat Abraham spoke with us about Breakthrough's work, past and future, in the horror space.

Why did Breakthrough choose to get into horror?

We began producing horror films in 2013 with the Black Fawn Films team, with their films Antisocial and The Drownsman. Our relationship with Black Fawn started by recognizing the potential of bringing our complementary resources together, and the relationship grew very quickly.

Horror is quite different from what Breakthrough Entertainment was doing at the time; however, it very quickly seemed like an exciting direction to take. Producing films in the horror genre can be more cost-effective than drama or comedy, and we really believed in the talent and capabilities of our partners.

Tell us about your distribution model. Where can horror fans find these films?

Most of the films are available now in Canada and the US, as well as several other countries, on DVD, Blu-ray, VOD services and pay TV. The distribution plan varies across the globe.

With English-speaking countries, the initial distribution plan involves a limited theatrical release, mainly to build on the buzz that these films generated during their screenings at genre film festivals around the globe. Rather than look for aggressive and expensive print and advertising campaigns, we prefer to go with limited theatrical releases, which can also act as the initial promotional launch, making the films more attractive to genre fans throughout the course of their subsequent release on VOD, DVD, pay TV and streaming VOD platforms. The key for us is to get them out quickly, but in a way that maintains the buzz in the marketplace.

Do you think horror is an especially appealing genre to audiences and filmmakers at this point in time?

Yes, it absolutely is. The horror genre has had a strong audience base for several decades, since the horror boom of the '80s and '90s. Fans of this genre want to see films that frighten them and take them to either an unknown or an uncomfortably familiar place where terrifying things can happen. The key is bringing audiences into these terrifying settings in new ways, with new narrative formats.

“Fans of this genre want to see films that frighten them and take them to either an unknown or an uncomfortably familiar place where terrifying things can happen. The key is bringing audiences into these terrifying settings in new ways, with new narrative formats.”

Given horror's comparatively low budgets and fans' voracious appetite for content, there is a lot that is currently being produced over relatively short periods of time. So it's critical to keep the films and the frights as fresh as possible. It's this demand that allows for interesting creative evolutions while also driving revenues, which is important from a studio perspective. We expect the horror genre will have tremendous stability for years to come.

What are Breakthrough's future plans for its work in the horror space?

Moving forward, we are looking to take our work to the next level by increasing budgets and elevating the star power for individual films.

We want to make sure that we are giving the horror fans out there what they want: fresh concepts and unexpected choices. Ultimately, we want to help pave the road of the genre instead of just driving on it.

CANADA'S (TOTALLY FRIENDLY, POLITE, VERY NICE) TAKEOVER OF THE GLOBAL FESTIVAL SCENE

Canada is rich with film festivals, but Canadian films punch above their weight around the world, too. Here's a quick look at Canadian films that have stolen the show at festivals beyond the Great White North.

FESTIVAL DE CANNES

Held against the backdrop of the French Riviera, Cannes is one of the most revered film festivals on the international circuit. Even with all the plaid and denim, Canadian filmmakers are clearly up to snuff. Over the past five years, the prestigious invitation-only festival has awarded seven Canadian films with designations and screened 23 Canuck flicks. Among the designations were three of Xavier Dolan's films:

- JUSTE LA FIN DU MONDE (2016) – Grand Jury Prize
- MOMMY (2014) – Jury Award
- LAURENCE ANYWAYS (2012) – Queer Palm, Best Actress for Suzanne Clément

INTERNATIONALE FILMFESTSPIELE BERLIN (BERLINALE)

Berlin, bierhalls (that's beer halls for the uninitiated) and coveted Golden Bears are what you'll find at this German film festival. That and a strong selection of Canadian films, most likely. During the past five years, Berlinale has screened 38 Canadian films and awarded them four beers—erm, Bears. Among them:

- REBELLE (dir. Kim Nguyen, 2012) – Silver Bear for Best Actress for Rachel Mwanza, Ecumenical Jury Prize Special Mention
- INCH'ALLAH (dir. Anaïs Barbeau-Lavalette, 2012) – FIPRESCI Prize, Ecumenical Jury Prize Special Mention

SEATTLE INTERNATIONAL FILM FESTIVAL

The city that spawned grunge music and the modern coffee craze is known for being the purveyor of all things cool, and Seattle's film festival is, naturally, just that. The Seattle International Film Festival has gained a reputation for awarding its Golden Space Needles to interesting niche films and challenging documentaries. The fact that it's screened 57 Canadian films and awarded five of them in the last five years goes to show our films can kick it with the cool kids. Not that we needed to be told we were cool, or anything. Among the awards:

- BOUNDARIES (PAYS) (dir. Chloé Robichaud, 2017) – Best New Director
- STILL MINE (dir. Michael McGowan, 2012) – Best Leading Actor for James Cromwell

FESTIVAL INTERNATIONAL DU FILM FRANCOPHONE DE NAMUR

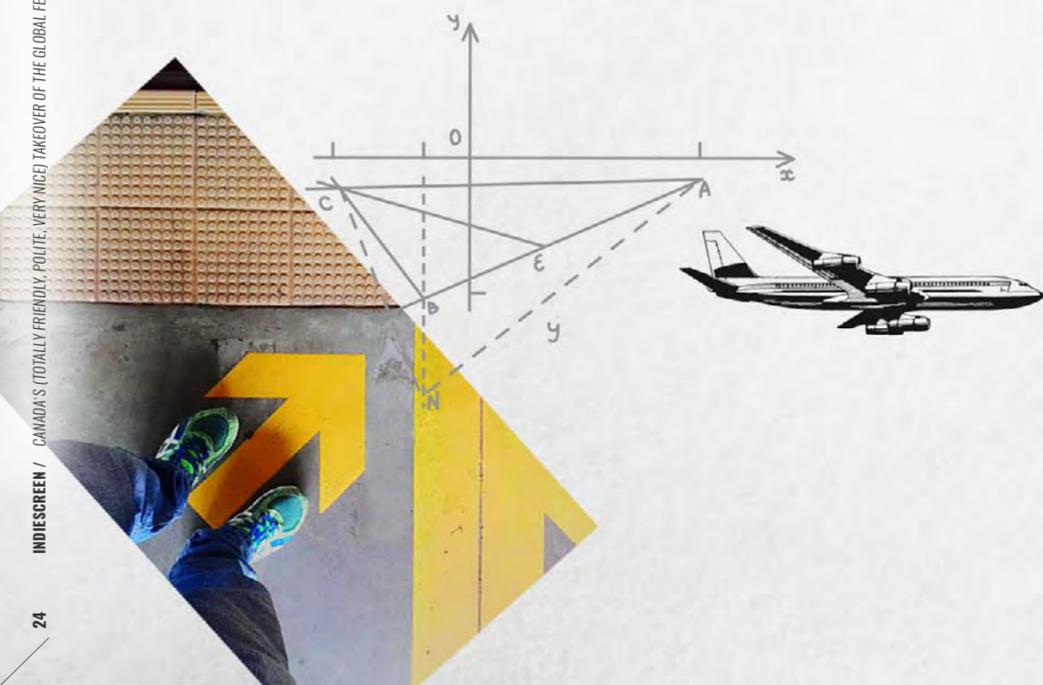

Canada's French heritage has made us internationally renowned for many things—Cirque du Soleil, poutine... and great French-language cinema. Namur, the Belgian film festival dedicated to celebrating exclusively French-language films, is just one of the many places Canada's French-language films are widely recognized. In the last five years, Namur screened 43 Canadian films to the tune of 11 awards. Among them:

- GABRIELLE (dir. Louise Archambault, 2013) – Audience Award for Best Film
- VIC + FLO SAW A BEAR (dir. Denis Côté, 2013) – Best Screenplay

SITGES FESTIVAL INTERNATIONAL DE CINEMA FANTASTIC DE CATALUNYA

Given the fact that much of Canada doesn't see sunlight for months at a time, it's unsurprising we're a hotbed for the fun, creepy and unsettling. Sitges, the Spanish genre film festival, is one of the most prominent showcases of international fantasy and horror (next to Montreal's own Fantasia, of course). It's here that Canadian filmmakers like father and son Cronenberg have won big for weird. Sitges has screened 41 Canadian films in five years, with 10 awards. Among them:

- ANTIVIRAL (dir. Brandon Cronenberg, 2012) – Carnet Jove Jury Award, Best Directorial Debut Award
- MAPS TO THE STARS (dir. David Cronenberg, 2014) – Best Actress for Julianne Moore

ONE AND CAFDE'S

MARK SLONE

DISTRIBUTION IN A BRAVE NEW WORLD

Film distribution is a particularly slippery aspect of the screen-based entertainment industry, with formats, technology and viewing habits changing faster than you can sell your Blu-ray player on Kijiji. No one knows this better than Mark Slone, Executive Vice-President of Theatrical Distribution and Marketing at eOne, and President of the Canadian Association of Film Distributors and Exporters (CAFDE), an organization that represents the interests of Canadian distribution companies. We recently caught up with Slone to get his take on the Canadian film sector and the changing nature of distribution in Canada and around the world.

The way audiences in Canada and around the world access and view content seems to be in the midst of a significant shift. How do you view your role as president of CAFDE at this particular point in time for the distribution business?

The Canadian distribution business is a challenging business, to be sure—I don't think I've ever experienced a time in my career where the business was truly stable. New technologies have always been the biggest disruptors. Early on, it was in new formats—VHS to DVD, DVD to Blu-ray—but now it's OTTs and digital delivery, which is a two-way street.

“The borders are under siege, but we still believe that we can create a situation in the digital world where Canadian content can live alongside this flood of product from around the world.”

We're not just distributing to consumers, consumers are also feeding information back to distributors, and that's a major shift in the way that we think about marketing our product. It opens up new opportunities, such as niche marketing, which lets us speak directly to the most likely consumer. This is particularly positive for Canadian film, which has a very small percentage of the marketplace, because it allows limited dollars to get used in the most effective way possible. On the flip side, the challenge is that there are reduced revenue streams across many media channels, and particular streams are drying up completely. At this point, it's not clear whether or not OTT is going to replace that revenue for Canada's film distributors.

What is the state of Canadian film distribution in today's global marketplace? Is the marketplace as borderless as we keep hearing it is?

The borders are still there, but they are definitely weaker than they were before. Traditionally, Canada has enjoyed a modicum of protection around its small share of the distribution marketplace, in the form of government policy that required non-Hollywood studios operating in Canada to be Canadian businesses. The theory was that if we were going to have a Canadian film sector, it was important to have businesses who understood the business of distribution and how to bring films to market if they were going to be able to carve out any space at all from the Hollywood behemoth.

Today, we have a situation where the digital world has allowed people from afar to bring content into the market more aggressively than before, and now we are looking to government, in particular, to reaffirm its commitment to a Canadian cinema, including ensuring that there is still a robust distribution sector. Yes, the borders are under siege, but we still believe that we can create a situation in the digital world where Canadian content can live alongside this flood of product from around the world.

Canadian Heritage Minister Mélanie Joly's cultural export strategy is to be released later this year. What are your hopes for it?

My hope is that the government will recognize that supporting export is key to building a healthy, productive sector that generates high-quality jobs. We're a market of only 37 million people, and to be able to produce large amounts of content, we require an audience beyond our borders. I'm really hopeful that this government will balance its responsibility to have a cinema that tells stories to Canadians and tells its stories within Canada with the need to carry our cinema forward to the world, both as an economic driver and also as a cultural ambassador for Canada.

INA FICHMAN

THE DOCUMENTARIAN

Documentaries are unpredictable. So says Montreal-based producer Ina Fichman, and while she means this in the sense that they're unscripted—the subject can easily take the wheel and force the filmmaker to ride shotgun—this description could equally apply to her choice of projects, and to her career as a documentary producer. With more than 20 years' experience, Fichman's varied filmography includes S&M, a doc about being short and male; Monsoon, Sturla Gunnarsson's award-winning film, set in India; the animated documentary The Wanted 18; and Vita Activa: The Spirit of Hannah Arendt, about the celebrated German-Jewish philosopher. We spoke with Fichman about some of her upcoming projects and her take on the challenges of making documentaries in Canada.

Tell us about the projects you currently have on the go.

I just did a film called The Patriot with a wonderful Israeli director named Daniel Sivan, about a very strange online hacking incident related to anti-Semitism in France. I'm also in post-production with another of his films, called The Oslo Diaries, which is the story of what happened in Oslo when Israel was negotiating peace with the Palestinians. Both are examples of what I like to call the creative documentary, where the point of view and the style of the director is paramount. And both are co-productions with Israel.

Are the majority of your films international co-productions?

I've been co-producing documentaries and other kinds of films internationally for more than 20 years—it's become my specialty. I do a lot of work in the Middle East; I've co-produced quite consistently with France. Honestly, I think co-production is what's going to permit me to survive as a documentary producer, because it's become very tough to produce films in Canada alone.

What are the toughest challenges that you and other documentary producers face?

"I think that documentary as a genre is seeing a tremendous, tremendous renaissance right now, and certainly we in Canada have a very long tradition of producing impactful, creative documentaries."

Our business model has become outdated. Traditionally, we've relied on broadcast television, and for whatever reason, broadcasters' commitment to the documentary is not what it—from my point of view—should be. Unlike ARTE in Europe, Canada doesn't have a public channel, producing hundreds of hours of documentary each year. It's just not what we have here, so for those of us who are committed to producing documentary, we need to find new ways of doing so.

OTT, for example: if there's any genre that's working well in OTT, it's the documentary. Working well on Amazon, working well on Netflix, starting to have a bit of a life on Hulu.

There are several areas in film and television production—kids' programming, for example—where we like to say Canada punches above its weight. Would you say documentary production is one of these?

I think that documentary as a genre is seeing a tremendous, tremendous renaissance right now, and certainly we in Canada have a very long tradition of producing impactful, creative documentaries. Obviously, there are many funds in Canada, both federal and private, which puts us in a great position. However, the funds require a level of commitment from a broadcaster, and as I said, there are very few broadcasters who are doing creative feature-length documentary. We have to convince our Canadian system, whether it's the broadcasters or the online world, the OTT world, that documentary is a genre worth paying attention to and financing.

What do you love about making documentaries?

I love that you can build a career in which no two films are alike. I love the people that I work with—the brave and committed directors, writers, DOPs, editors—and the stories that I have encountered. And I love the powerful impact that documentary can have on the viewer.

Who's protecting your rights
royalties?

You need experts like us to ensure you're covered, now more than ever before.

Why? Because retransmission and other secondary-use rights are increasingly complex. Changes in copyright laws, licensing terms, delivery technologies, and consumer habits complicate the protection of these rights and the collection of associated royalties.

Three not-for-profit organizations founded by the Canadian Media Producers Association work together to ensure that Canadian producers and other rightsholders maximize their royalty revenues in Canada and around the world, and help them identify works and track their use.

Isn't it time you joined your peers in taking steps to maximize your royalties? Learn more: www.crc-scr.ca/we-stand-on-guard-for-thee.html
